

taste?

Taste starts arguments.
Principles end them.

The five rules Night Ace designs by decide.

Why principles

Debates about how something looks can run forever.
Debates about a rule end quickly. A principle is a design decision you make once — then reuse on every screen that follows.

one.

One job per screen

Every screen gets one job, and the layout should make it obvious. When everything is bold, nothing is.

space.

Whitespace is structure

Empty space isn't wasted space — it's how readers know what belongs together. Crowded layouts push that work onto the visitor.

type.

Type does the heavy lifting

Most of an interface is text. Get the type right — size, spacing, contrast — and the design is mostly finished before a single decoration appears.

again.

Consistency beats novelty

The second time a pattern appears, it should look exactly like the first. People learn an interface once; don't make them relearn it on every page.

less.

Everything earns its place

If removing an element changes nothing, it was decoration. Remove things until something breaks, then put only that one thing back.

purpose.

Designed on purpose

Principles are why a design survives contact with real content.

Want a site designed on purpose? Send Night Ace a message — we'll show you our reasoning, not just our portfolio.